Palm Beach was the tropical retreat of the Kennedy clan in the 1950s and '60s—a time when the kings of Jordan or Spain could be spotted dining on croquettes Joint Jacques at the long-gone Petite Marmite, and celebrities such as Frank Sinatra knocked back Jack Daniels at the swankiest nightclubs. "We wanted this to feel like a younger throwback to that heyday," says Kristine Greenblatt, studio director in charge of decorating at the New York-based design firm Pembridge & Ives, which was tasked with refurbishing this 3,700-square-foot apartment for a couple. (Also on board were the firm's founder, Andrew Sheinman, and studio director in charge of interior architecture Peggy Gubelmann). Outright mimicry, however, wouldn't fly. "We tried to go with something more understated," says Sheinman, who took his cue from one of the clients. "She has incredible style—very simple, strong lines, nothing fussy or embellished." Having worked with the homeowners on a previous New York residence, Greenblatt also knew the desired palette would be creamy, to serve as a backdrop for pieces from the clients' impressive art collection.

After completely gutting the space, Gubelmann reconfigured rooms, imparting a sense of procession befitting some of Palm Beach's grander estates. Visitors are introduced to honed limestone floors in the elevator lobby, where two mirrored works by Françoise Turner-Larcaude deliver a high-impact welcome. "Form meets function perfectly here," says Sheinman, pointing out that the proportions of the piece distract attention from the modest dimensions of the space, while its reflective surfaces allow visitors to adjust themselves before proceeding.

The vestibule opens onto a central foyer with frescoed walls that accesses a family room further along the enfilade, private quarters at left and the sprawling open-plan living room-dining room-kitchen to the right. The foyer lays out several central thrones that thread throughout the apartment. Lamps'ies, stunning polished chrome Orions desk and table, through Nella Vetrina, dominate the room, establishing them as: bold silhouettes minimally deployed to emphasize their sculptural presence. Invoking the Palm Beach locale (thesis two) are four 1960s hosted gold glass sconces discovered at John Selbello that recall palm fronds. Overhead, Greenblatt placed a vintage Gio Ponti 10-arm light fixture. "This scale of the fixture makes the space feel more important," notes Greenblatt, elucidating thesis three, whereby scale and architectural tricks—here a cove Gubelmann cut into the ceiling—optimize the low height of most rooms. Finally, Italian midcentury lighting throughout summons the desired period obliquely, simultaneously introducing just the right level of mellow glamour (thesis four).
The main public room follows these ideas through. Living room seating areas anchored by custom sofas feature sculptural turnings; rocky must armless chair in one, a pair of wood-framed Ted Boerner lounge chairs in another closer to the balcony terrace. Dining chairs from Montana-based Castle Design, says Greenblatt, also have "a sculptural profile that looks good from every angle." Rich textures bring variety to the palette without disturbing the monochrome that allows a Fernand Léger painting plenty of room to dazzle. The hand-tufted Beauvais carpet's alternating pile height creates a grid pattern. Maharam woven silk wallcoverings subtly telegraph richness, and the textured Donghia linen of the draperies (bordered by floor-to-ceiling trim to accentuate height), says Greenblatt, "feels light but dressy."

The Palm Beach reference is less obvious here, manifesting in throw pillows covered in orange Fortuny and Jim Thompson fabrics—"a nod to Lilly Pulitzer," says Greenblatt—and the thick green glass of James Magni's Jewel side tables, which, she adds, echo the liquid Intracoastal Waterway views. Italian midcentury lighting appears again with Gio Ponti sconces in the dining room and a 1970s Stilnovo fixture over a refinished Karl Springer dining table. "When you have a space that's this clean," says Greenblatt, "you need to have that chic lighting to complete every room." The minimalist furniture, like for tables with distinct sculptural character—another Springer and a Jun Ho two-part, white-lacquered custom coffee table in the seating area with the Boerner chairs.

Appropriate to the beachy setting, notes Sheehan, other than the Léger, "the art is more whimsical, not as much of a commitment." This includes a 14-port ceramic wall piece by Marcin Koppmann that creates interesting shadows throughout the day, and Ormond Gigli's 1960 Gels in the Windows. In the clubby family room, warm carved oak paneling frames the undulating wood of a Castle Design coffee table, the Holly Hunt fabric and leather of the lounge chair, and the Holland and Sherry chenille of the Profiles sofa. On the wall, a 1970s image of Warhol photographing Bianca Jagger in a London nightclub is a departure from all the softness," says Greenblatt. Pembroke & Ives, pembrokeandives.com
