CONTENTS

98 EDITOR’S LETTER

RADAR

CUSTOMIZATION
A look at how personalization and one-of-a-kind features are the ultimate expression of luxury.

COMMENTARY
Designers and architects from around the country shed light on their own definitions of living the good life.

COLLABORATION
Inspired by worldly glamour and stateside style, Timothy Corrigan teams up with PIet Boon for a new fabric and rug launch.

TABLETOP
Artistic dishes add a touch of creative whimsy to this season’s place settings.

SCENE
Our cheat sheet to all things new and fabulous in the local design community.

MARKET

MATERIAL
From refined patterns to rich solids, the latest fabrics are put on full display.

TREND
Fall’s new coffee table books inspire an array of product finds.

SPOTLIGHT
Today’s talented furniture makers are using traditional woven elements in a very modern way.

THE LOOK

KITCHEN + BATH
Bold and sophisticated color is making a splash in kitchens and baths.

THE REPORT
Take a peek into the world of high-end living and all its sumptuous offerings.
Luxe explores what luxury means today, gets the scoop on a dynamic fabric and rug collaboration and dishes on the season's hottest tabletop designs.
Made to ORDER

Fashion designer Michael Kors once said, "A man in a well-tailored suit will always shine brighter than a guy in an off-the-rack suit." With customization on the rise, many designers are turning to homes outfitted with bespoke elements—including Achille Salvagni, principal of his eponymous international architectural and design practice. In the last 10 years, my clientele has increasingly sought out homes that are one-of-a-kind," he says. "In many ways, looking to a designer is like looking for a tailor that can make a dress that fits your body perfectly." He adds a client who recently hired him to create a highly custom home in Mumbai, India. "She wanted a living room that was a portrait of her family," he explains. "After interviewing the family members, I created furniture that represents the qualities of each. A sofa embodies the personality of the father, the table is inspired by the daughter—-together, all the furniture tells this family's story."

Maria Apella Cruz, who co-founded the decorative arts studio M.J. Abilene with her husband Mike Jovanovic, also sees an increase in customers seeking one-off wallcoverings, furnishings, and lighting. "We are raising the bar of designers who want to bring their ideas to life," she says. "Today's clients are looking for conversation pieces that have a sense of place to them, and we are playing a large role in that." An example is the wallcovering they made for an iconic video gamer that includes symbols from classics including Zelda, Pac-Man and Poseidon.

Cruz says that bringing a designer's creations to life requires finding the right craftsperson and that's challenging. "Many artists of quality craftsmanship have a lifetime to master—but by the time you've perfected your trade, it's time to retire," she says. "Traditionally, a lot of information was passed down through families, but these days, some of the offspring of contemporary craftspersons are pursuing other things. To keep these skills alive, she and her husband have started..."
a teaching guild—and to the couple's delight, they are discovering an eager audience. "The stereotype of a millenial is a person staring at a computer screen," Cruz says. "But we've found many young people who want to learn how to paint, draw and gild."

That's not to say there's no place for computer screens in today's customization climate. In fact, technology is facilitating even higher levels of tailored details. "These days, we have old-world techniques and modern tools living together—you'll find an anvil next to computer-driven cutting equipment," says Paul Verbeek, the general manager at Hammond Custom. "Computer modeling is enabling us to do things we couldn't have imagined in the past—we recently created a model showing a 6,000-pound fixture that's 25 feet at its widest point. It's the easiest and fastest way to show how a piece like that would look in a space."

But custom design takes longer and is more expensive to produce—so why are more consumers seeking it out? George Matouk, Jr., CEO and president of the linen company that bears his family's name, believes it's the personal aspect that makes the effort and expenditure worth it. The company offers their products in bespoke sizes, colors and fabrics. "Every person has a different idea about what makes the perfect design elements. What could be better than picking your own fabrics in the color combination to make something just for you? Customization is the ultimate expression of luxury."